Irrigated Agriculture in Times of Climate Change

Dates: 25 October - 7 November, 2017
 13 - 26 March, 2018

Climate change has been identified as one of the world's largest challenges. As the first sector to suffer its consequences, agriculture will have to adapt. Israeli agriculture has been anticipating the effects of climate change for decades and is impressively adapted for arid and semi-arid climates. As a key player in the global agricultural landscape, the country benefits from a prosperous agricultural market founded on practical and cost-effective innovations and solutions, rather than natural resources.

This course focusses on the sustainable methods applied to achieve high yields and food security, while protecting water sources and mitigating land degradation and desertification. Participants will meet experts in the field, producers, distributors and even innovators. This is an immersion course that takes participants to the heart of the "Israeli agricultural miracle".

Agribusiness and Postharvest Management

Dates: 25 October - 7 November, 2017
13 - 26 March, 2018

Agribusiness is still of central importance to most of the world's economies. To effectively contribute to economic growth there must be coordinated links between agribusiness firms, farmers, retailers and others in the supply chain. The challenges are many as changing consumer preferences, fluctuating supply and demand and climate change create new and unpredictable conditions. Additionally, ensuring consumer safety and quality requires strict regulatory controls, including environmental considerations. This programme presents innovative methods and technologies for adapting to changing conditions, creating effective links and increasing production.

Environmental Management

Dates: 25 October - 7 November, 2017
 13 - 26 March, 2018

Globally, policy makers and professionals are challenged with minimising the impact of consumption and industry on the environment. In Israel, where land, water, energy and other natural resources are either limited or non-existent, environmental research is not a luxury - it is a matter of survival. This course aims to share the solutions to waste treatment, energy, air and water quality that have been successfully adapted over the years. They seek to maximise socio-economic potential while preventing consequences that threaten the integrity of the environment and its resources and are harmful to our health.
